Hi Leanne
I have 4 hours consulting and then will get onto it.
Sorry to have burdened you and Stephen with the extra work

[REDACTED] I am concerned about sending a letter directly to parents from BAC waitlist out of the blue, saying we are closed and to recontact local CYMHS if support needed - if the parents have an expectation that the referral is still active, it may not be the right way to share the information.

> I think it would be better if the referring CYMHS contacted the family - realistically, they should have withdrawn the BAC referral at the time they discharged the young person, and if the contact raises ongoing mental health issues, they would be the service to respond.

When we have called CYMHS they have informed us of long non-attendance but they have no indication of reasons for disengagement. Where they have had info, I have documented that to you both.

> Anne, in your transitional role it would be wise to attempt to contact these [REDACTED] and find out what the reasons for disengagement were. We are unable to offer increased services at this time; they would need to be followed up at their local CYMHS or other appropriate local services. In your role, you could offer a reassessment to determine if their mental state had deteriorated and/or you still believe they need mental health support if so, broker a re-engagement with CYMHS (or other mental health services). We would need to let the local CYMHS know beforehand, to make certain they agree with the plan. Might be going overboard, but I am aware of the political sensitivities of these young people.
